

ISOLATION INTERVIEWS

DOMENICO DE CHIRICO

ISSUE 10

Continuing the Isolation Interviews: a new series of weekly artist and curator profiles highlighting current concerns, accompanied by a selection of available works.

We know that these are precarious and uncertain times for everyone and with so many people staying at home, self-isolating or social distancing, we want to be able to continue sharing some of our favourite art and artists with you. The Isolation Interviews are a weekly series of conversations with artists and curators that will explore how these new circumstances are affecting their practices, projects and productivity. We'll hear how they are finding solutions - and even opportunities - and what their plans and hopes are for the future.

Brooke Benington is committed to supporting and creating opportunities for artists. We believe that this is needed now more than ever. Most artists are self-employed, often supplementing their income by working as technicians, fabricators, assistants, teachers and a whole host of other jobs. Now, many have very suddenly lost a vital source of income. With this in mind, we are accompanying each Isolation Interview with a curated selection of work by that artist, available for purchase.

Thank you for your continued support. Stay safe and look after one another.

You are currently in Milan where a lockdown has been in place since the start of March. How is the artistic community in the city coping? Are there signs of people finding creative ways to be productive, make and share their art?

This is a historic moment of transition and extreme dislocation, of boredom and of concerns. It's a very serious time that no one will ever forget. Speaking metaphorically, this is a test which requires, in the near future and not just today, considerable efforts and several months, or perhaps years, of work: we have to come from a position of strength, it's a matter of patience, of self-respect and a combined effort from surrounding world. Furthermore, it will certainly require new planning that is somehow already taking place. Talking about myself, I want to understand more than just colours I can see and precisely for this reason I've decided to re-read Benedetto Croce's thoughts together with questionable newspapers, comments and opinions from politicians and opinion-makers from all over the world. I've also begun watching more TV - as I almost never do that.

Despite the actions I mentioned above, people are certainly finding alternative creative ways to be productive, make and share their art, and I presume this is clearly happening everywhere and not only in Milan, by using all means in our power.

You are the first curator we have spoken to in this series. Could you tell us a bit about your curatorial practice, how you usually operate and how if at all you are adapting to the current situation?

Trying things differently from a realistic and flexible perspective, in this grave moment I'm mainly working on long-term projects, both online collaborations and exhibitions, critical texts and artist statements. I'd prefer not to describe them in detail because obviously they're all upcoming and yet to be announced, but they will be visible soon (but who knows when). Others still pending. But we're in a weird world where everything is different nowadays, and sadly it doesn't taste the same. But I hope for the best, like the rest of us.

You are known as something of a "talent spotter" with an eye for finding emerging artists and curating, in some cases, their first solo or international exhibitions. Is there a particular characteristic or approach that you think draws you to an artist? Do you think that it is more instinctual or intellectual?

In terms of characteristics, I'd say openness, aesthetics, impartiality and magic, among other and defined identity and consciousness in terms of approach.

Furthermore, I firmly believe that the beingness of man is made up of intellect, instinct and will - all of which are closely related.

Are there any artists that you are particularly excited by right now? Either that you have worked with or hope/plan to work with in the future?

Yes, the answer is absolutely yes! I have selected six artists who are of particular interest to me at the moment to accompany this interview: Anders Holen, Édouard Nardon, Harrison Pearce, Marina Weffort, Philipp Röcker & Sinae Yoo.

Out of necessity, over the past couple of months, we have finally seen the art world embrace online platforms as a way of sharing and consuming art - if not necessarily purchasing it - with a proliferation of online viewing rooms and other invites launching. How do you feel about this and do you think it will continue once the lockdown is lifted?

In the light of the current needs, it's necessary to maintain the principles of autonomy and self-management - in addition to the fact that anything is possible with technology nowadays, so that's why I think that is just another form of keeping things constantly alive and I suppose it will continue once the lockdown is lifted.

The art world has become increasingly international over the last ten years, you regularly curate shows not only in Italy but across Europe. It seems likely that international travel might be one of the last restrictions to be lifted once the coronavirus is (hopefully) brought under control, art fairs, in particular, seem unlikely for a while. Do you think that we may see a resurgence of local arts communities and independent galleries? Do you think this would be beneficial or detrimental to the wider art world?

Honestly speaking, I don't know how to make predictions at this stage of the current situation or maybe just don't want to. I do strongly believe that we all need to focus on today to re-shape the future.
